Bunubu and the Tiny Tunnel Tornado
Understanding someone's feelings can turn a problem into a friendship.

One breezy morning, socks, spoons, and sunflower seeds began zooming through the underground tunnels.

Bunubu peeked around a corner and spotted a tiny spinning tornado no bigger than a watering can.

The little tornado whirled through the burrows, twirling socks into the air and spinning spoons like shiny pinwheels.

The tunnel neighbors scrambled to catch their belongings as seeds bounced and rolled everywhere.

Bunubu tried asking the tornado to slow down, but it only spun faster and faster.

Then Bunubu noticed something curious.
Whenever music drifted through the tunnels, the tornado twirled in perfect circles.

'I think it wants to dance!' Bunubu said. He tapped two spoons together to make a cheerful rhythm.

The tornado slowed down and spun gracefully to the beat. Soon the neighbors joined in with claps, stomps, and songs.

The tiny tornado introduced itself as Twirly. It had only wanted someone to dance with.

From then on, Twirly visited for weekly tunnel dances. Socks stayed on feet, spoons stayed on tables, and everyone had a wonderfully twirly time.
