Bunubu and the Upside-Down Garden

Sometimes the best solution comes from understanding how something different wor

One morning, Bunubu followed a trail of leafy footprints into a hidden underground room.

Inside, roots grew from the ceiling, and vegetables hung down like glowing lanterns.

Carrots dangled above Bunubu's head, turnips swung gently, and beet bulbs shone with rosy light.

The garden friends stood below with watering cans, looking puzzled. 'Which way do we water an upside-down garden?' asked Sprig.

One beetle tried watering the floor. One mole tried watering the ceiling. A worm accidentally watered his own hat.

Bunubu listened closely. Drip, drip, drip. The roots were whispering from above.

'Water the roots, not the vegetables,' said Rooty, the oldest ceiling root. 'We drink from up here.'

Bunubu tied tiny watering cups to long vines so everyone could gently pour water onto the ceiling roots.

The upside-down garden sparkled. The hanging vegetables glowed brighter than ever, like lanterns at a harvest party.

From then on, Bunubu and the garden friends watered up instead of down. The upside-down garden grew happily in its own wonderfully strange way.
