

Chibub and the Worry Bubble

— Chibub befriends a worry bubble and learns that big feelings get smaller when shared. — Chibub woke up in his cozy condo bed. A tiny gray bubble floated beside him. It whispered, 'What if today feels too big?'

Chibub brushed his curls and flapped his wings.
The gray bubble followed close behind. 'Go away,' he whispered, but it stayed.

Chibub tried to fly across the room. But the worry bubble felt heavy. His little wings only made one tiny flutter.

He opened the window for fresh air. The park below looked bright and green. Maybe outside would help.

Chibub fluttered to the park bench. He saw a child holding a kite. The child looked worried too.

'I have a worry,' said Chibub. 'Me too,' said the child. The bubble became a little smaller.

Chibub pointed to the bubble. 'I think mine is called New Things.' The child nodded. 'Mine is called Trying.'

They breathed in like smelling flowers. They breathed out like cooling soup. The worry bubbles grew soft and pale.

Together, they fixed the kite string. The kite lifted into the sky. Chibub felt lighter than a cloud.

That night, Chibub tucked himself into bed. The worry was still there, but very small. 'Goodnight, little worry,' he said.
